Health Happens Where You Live...Did You Know?

While snow can make commutes more difficult, it's also a fun way to get a workout in. Running around and having a snowball fight, or even just treading through the snow can be fun ways to have an unintended workout. The cold weather also provides a great opportunity to go ice skating. For those with winter aversion, snow can be a great excuse to stay inside and read a book or engage in a different mental health promoting activity.

portraits made. The stars aligned when Maxine Carey, one of the participants in the Artist in Residence Program, walked into the celebration and finally saw her portrait hanging on a huge banner after months of searching for the program's exhibit. In an article in Mental Health Association's Creative Newsletter, Maxine writes that the celebration: "was a great experience for me first to see the display of my picture done by 'Artist, Charmaine' on the wall as I entered the room. I have been trying to see this display at the U of R library since it was done so this was my first time seeing this display."

"Working in the community for over 40 years as a caseworker and in ministry a great concern I had was mental health among seniors... This breakfast celebration brought together a good number of individuals and community agencies working together now, it is a long time coming for me this was a concern for me that I now believe will be addressed, to include more diversity across the board in networking and research. I knew many of the people and agencies represented from the community, ministry and volunteering."

Dr. Ben Lee remarked that there was: "Great food and great discussion! More than anything, it was great to see our community leaders and partners who could guide us in our vision to provide more behavioral health services to those who are in need in our community."
